I started to write the study as a research fellow at the University of California in Santa Cruz, a position that was generously sponsored by the American Council of Learned Societies. It was on the beautiful campus overlooking the Pacific Ocean dotted with black figures of all-time surfers, from where every morning white mist rose up toward us, accompanied by the melodious chants of sea-lions, that I was able to get through the initial stages of my project. My original proposal of course envisaged a far more rapid advance of my work than I was actually able to achieve. Not that I would not be willing to put in extra effort but the University of California offered far too many academic temptations that I was unable to resist: discovering the phenomenon of the Internet, getting acquainted with the explosion of recent theoretical writing, participating in several classes and post-graduate seminars, savoring the pleasures of research in a fully computerized, walk-in library, browsing through the bookstores in Berkeley's Telegraph Avenue, talking to American colleagues as well as to other visiting professors and "comparing notes." Thus I left the hospitable and stimulating Santa Cruz atmosphere with only half of the work done – but with lots of invaluable impressions, a wealth of material both for my own research and for my teaching, and with several promising academic contacts as well as with the hope that I would be able to finish the project within the next year.

Yet the frantic nature of the school-year at the Brno English Department decided otherwise and it was not until the summer of 1995 that I managed to resume my work. In the fall I had the good luck of enjoying another brief stipend, this time sponsored by the Austrian South-East European Institute. The month of October, which I spent in the Central European atmosphere of Vienna, was a period of intense and focused writing, when I managed to reinhabit the intertextual universe of my project and made major progress toward its completion. At this point I think it appropriate to express my most sincere gratitude to the ACLS as well as to the ÖOSI for their support of my research effort.

Likewise, I would like to thank a number of colleagues who, at different moments, helped me with their kind advice, comments or encouragement. First of all I would like to mention Professor Josef Jafab, DrSc., whose suggestions were crucial at important cross-sections of the project and PhDr. Don Sparling, B.A. whose assistance stood at the very beginning, when he discussed with me the various possibilities of a research topic, as well as at the very end, when he commented on parts of the almost finished work. Further I would like to mention Professor Jules Zanger, twice a Fulbright Professor at the Brno Department of English and American Studies, who encouraged me toward academic work, as well as Professors Michael Cowan and Forest Robinson of Santa Cruz, Ella Thorp Ellis of Berkeley, Anthony Chennels of Zimbabwe and Art Redding and Jeffrey Vanderziel of Brno for their stimulating comments on sections of my text. Likewise, I must thank my friend and colleague Jiří Rambousek, who sacrificed several hours of his precious time and gave me some vital advice concerning the printing of the original text of the dissertation.

Besides my colleagues, I also feel obliged to mention other people without whose assistance I would have been unable to carry on with my endeavor. Above all I must express my gratitude to my Austrian friend Mr. Karl Uiblein, who generously provided me with comfortable accommodation during my stay in Vienna and my father for letting me use his apartment in Brno's Tučkova Street when I was unable – for one reason or another – to write at home. Thanks to its gallery-like flavor the apartment functioned not only as a kind of intellectual sanctuary but also as a source of inspiration.

Naturally, the acknowledgement would be incomplete without mentioning the people whose support I needed most: my wife Sylvia and my children Terezka and Danny. I am especially grateful to Sylvia for her double role in the project: as the first critic and the ultimate giver of confidence. Whenever a passage met with her approval, I felt much strengthened in my effort to keep writing. Besides, I appreciated her matter-of-fact comments and keen insights. Finally I must thank both Sylvia and particularly the children for their large amounts of tolerance and patience, for they had to put up with long periods of absence (be it physical or mental) on the part of their daddy – a no easy thing to do when one is five or eight years old.
